Industrial accidents are important public health problem that undermines the productivity of industrial workers. Although the financial cost of this type of accidents is a real loss; yet the resulting deaths and disability in addition to human suffering is really intolerable. What adds to the complexity of the problem is the multi-factorial nature of the causes of accidents. However, applying specifically tailored control programs through task based training can contribute to the limitation and prevention of accidents and proper dealing with its different outcomes. In occupational health, identification of safety hazards is fundamental. Risk evaluation and management is a well known approach that contributes to control of the hazard at the source as a primary objective.
